III. Reading

When Christina FourHorn was spending time in her house, the police came and told her they had a warrant for her arrest. She was so surprised the only crime she had ever committed was driving too fast. No one wanted to listen to her, so she was arrested and locked up in a Colorado jail. The police took her belongings and gave her a jail uniform. She told them she was not guilty, but they ignored her and were not interested in paying attention to her story. Fortunately, it took five days for her husband to borrow enough money to bail her out. Later, it turned out that FourHorn was innocent, that police had arrested the wrong woman. They were searching for a robber, Christin Fourhorn, who lived in Oklahoma. Their names were just similar. The proper suspect was eight years older than Christina and had a tattoo on her arm. Christina FourHorn didn't have any special features. The police made many mistakes and caused lots of stress so Christina FourHorn found a lawyer and filed a lawsuit against the police claiming the arrest had violated her civil rights. The case was settled, but the terms remained confidential. She probably received compensation. Now, after some years, when FourHorn sees a police car, she says she is still nervous. She knows she shouldn't because she is a good citizen. But she says, "If it happened once, it can happen again."
